While outmigration in Thunder Bay slowed between 2001 and 2011, many city neighbourhoods also saw their average income increase.

That's some of the statistical data that can be found in an interactive map on the Northern Policy Institute's new online data tool — Northbynumbers.ca.

"It's a visual interaction so you can get employment numbers, you can get average income, you can get types of housing — whether people own their own houses or rent — and you can do it visually so you can put it on a map and get it all the way down to neighbourhood levels," said NPI president and CEO Charles Cirtwill.

The site uses census data from 2001, 2006 and 2011 and Cirtwill said the site breaks down that information from Statistics Canada into an easily digestible format.

"Take a city like Thunder Bay and split it into 40 or 50 different neighbourhoods and you can see what's going on next door," he said, adding the NPI is mandated to help people measure progress in the North.

The site is a joint project between NPI and the North Superior Workforce Planning Board.
